missing paperwork - time differences; A quantity of points that a basketball player can "pay" in advance depends on various factors, such as the rules of the league that he is playing in, his contract and the preference of the coach. In general, however, the practice of allowing players to "pay" points in advance is discouraged, as it can be seen as a form of cheating. In some basketball leagues, such as the NBA, the regulations allow players to "pay" points in advance under certain conditions. For example, if a player has more than five personal fouls, he can be removed from the game and a teammate from the same team can enter the game in his place. In this case, the player who leaves the game can "pay" points to his substitute, which means that the substitute comes to play with a predetermined number of points in favor. However, this is rarely allowed in the NBA and is at the discretion of the referee to decide whether to allow this to happen.

In summary, the quantity of points that a basketball player can "pay" in advance depends on various factors, including the rules of the league, his contract and the preference of the coach. It is important to note that the practice of allowing players to "pay" points in advance is discouraged, as it can be seen as a form of cheating.
